PRESIDENT'S REPORT

2012-2013

A Message from Dr. Lewis E. Thayne

Dear Alumni, Parents, and Friends,

For this issue, I had two requests of our editor, Tom Hanrahan. The first was to bring the President's Report to press before the end of the calendar year. The second was to focus on technology at Lebanon Valley College. By tradition, the President's Report highlights events and accomplishments of the fiscal year, which ended June 30. I have excerpted what I consider the key accomplishments of a very eventful first year of my presidency. None of this is news, but it should convey a longer-term perspective on ways in which the College is executing on its mission.

The content focus of the President's Report is relevant now and will continue to be relevant for the foreseeable future. Technology will have a huge impact on higher education at Lebanon Valley College and on how we educate our graduates for work and life in a global economy. The stories accompanying the report are testimony to what we are already doing exceptionally well with technology, but they also look ahead to where we are going in this area.

A third and very important role of the President's Report is to acknowledge and thank those people who are so integral to the ongoing work and success of the College. The Honor Roll of Donors is contained in this issue for the first time in many years. It includes the names of individuals who provide the greatest financial support to the mission of LVC and to the work of individual faculty and students. The fact that every gift makes a difference is especially true when one realizes that many charitable foundations count the percentage of alumni who donate to their alma mater as a primary measure for consideration of financial support.

Philanthropic support is increasingly important as we enter a period of transition and innovation on campus. I am very grateful for the generous support of our donors. In addition to their philanthropy, I am also delighted to acknowledge and express gratitude for the extraordinary dedication and commitment of our Board of Trustees, led by Chair Wesley T. Dellinger '75, P'05.

In August 2012, a liaison officer from the Middle States Commission on Higher Education visited me and emphasized that our accreditation was in jeopardy if we did not move quickly and effectively to comply with the standards of our peers. This situation called for an immediate and intensive response. The signal accomplishment for the year is the completion of comprehensive assessment and institutional effectiveness work that was required by the Middle States Commission on Higher Education. In response to the campus community's efforts, our warning status was lifted as of June 28, 2013. All agree that we are a better college as a result of the college-wide effort on compliance. In a very real sense, the assessment and institutional effectiveness work will serve as preparation for the collaborative strategic planning process we will begin in January 2014.

Lebanon Valley College has exceeded my expectations at every turn and in no area more so than in its commitment to academic innovation. In response to this faculty ethos, I instituted the President's Innovation Fund and presented the first grants to 13 programs ranging from a new course in designed experience to a service learning project in Peru, and from collaborative diversity initiatives to a feasibility study for a new program in athletic training. The entrepreneurial strengths of the faculty are fully reflected in this first round of awards.

Hands-on learning is one of our signatures at LVC. As part of Inauguration Week, Inquiry 2013 showcased the accomplishments of 170 students during our celebration of the scholarly and creative achievements of the student body. This program is held in the gymnasium and is as energizing and exciting in its way as any athletic contest could be. If you have an opportunity to attend Inquiry 2014 on April 10, I urge you to do so.

A year can also be memorable for what did not happen. The College came through Hurricane Sandy mostly unscathed—classes were canceled and administrative offices were closed for two days. However, registration filled in just four minutes for the spring break trip to help rebuild the Jersey Shore. Thirty-five of our students spent a week repairing devastated homes.

Our students received national recognition for their commitment to service and interfaith dialogue. In the spring, we were named to the President's Higher Education Community Service Honor Roll. Lebanon Valley College students—under the leadership of Chaplain Paul Fullmer—have an exemplary record of service and commitment to interfaith dialogue. Recognition by the White House was well deserved and very affirming.

I am building a new leadership team at the College to enhance our strengths and meet the challenges ahead with new ideas and perspectives. Janet Wiley, formerly vice president for development and alumni affairs at Goucher College in Baltimore, Md., began her duties on January 14, 2013. Janet is charged with strengthening efforts in alumni and parent engagement as well as increasing gift income. In her first year, Janet and her staff reached the goal for The Valley Fund for the first time in 15 years. Steven O'Day was named to the newly created position of special assistant to the president for innovative programming at Lebanon Valley College. Steve is responsible for innovative, high-priority programs, including coordination and expansion of high-impact experiences, comprehensive post-graduate preparation, and leadership learning programs involving students, faculty, and staff. During my seven years at Franklin & Marshall, Steve served as senior associate dean so I know he is well suited to this role at LVC. Finally, Karen Feather recently became my executive assistant to the president and assistant secretary of the College. An Annville native, adjunct faculty member, and former chief of staff for a congressman, Karen is well matched to this senior position at the College.

One-third of our students participate in intercollegiate athletics. Many students choose our college because of the opportunity to engage in a first-class educational experience, to participate in top-tier athletics, and to work with coaches of unquestioned integrity. During the 2012–2013 academic year, we garnered MAC or Commonwealth championships in women's basketball, women's indoor track, and women's softball, and an ECAC Championship in women's lacrosse. We added women's golf, which finished second at the MAC Championships in their first season. The College also opened the renovated Arnold Field to rave reviews from student-athletes, alumni, parents, and fans.

In July, I attended a gathering of college and university presidents from Central Pennsylvania. One of the longer-serving presidents asked me how long I had been at Lebanon Valley College. "It will be one year in August," I said. He looked at me with a wry smile, "In the first year, we are permitted to make mistakes. In the second year, it is very important not to make the identical mistakes." A sense of humor is important, even essential. But there is also wisdom in his comment. Every year there are accomplishments and much to be grateful for—and every year there are reasons to improve. I am very glad to be in my second year at our College and focused on new accomplishments and a promising future. Nothing gives me a greater sense of joy and mission than watching our students as they shape their education and the life of the College. I hope you will have a sense of this as you read the President's Report.

Warmest Regards,

Dr. Lewis E. Thayne, President

UX (User Experience),

the shorthand version of what is the newest of the six concentrations in the College's Digital Communications major, is probably a term unfamiliar to most of us. However, the addition of a new concentration is representative of how LVC's faculty and students—and alumni—continue to move forward in today's world of technology.

Whether it is in the classroom through traditional majors such as computer science and English communications or through emerging majors such as digital communications and music recording technology, Lebanon Valley College has long been at the forefront of educational technology.

Dr. Lewis E. Thayne has committed support for technology at the College through the President's Innovation Grants, the revitalization of the Lynch Technology Center, expansion of the Center for Excellence in Teaching and Learning, and the establishment of a Technology Task Force. The task force—comprised of trustees, faculty, students, and administrators—will examine current and emerging technologies, and develop a plan to establish LVC as a leader in the use of technology to support teaching and learning.

This path would not be possible without the financial support of our many alumni and friends. This issue of the President's Report highlights alumni involved in various technology sectors and a few of the many faculty and administrative technology-related projects occurring on campus.

To see a list of all donors to the College during the 2012–2013 academic year—alumni, parents, and friends spanning generations of supporters—please visit www.lvc.edu/honor-roll-2013.

Enjoy the “fun facts,” many of them technology related, that are scattered throughout the Honor Roll of Donors. Thank you to everyone for all that you do for the Valley!

When Technology Tells the Deepest Stories

Caitlin Murphy '12 didn't come to the Valley to learn about technology, but ultimately she found that it gave her the tools to communicate some of her most important lessons.

Murphy was a basketball standout at LVC, participating in a record-setting 115 games. She also carried a 3.92 GPA while triple-majoring in English, sociology, and international studies, and studying abroad—twice.

It was when she returned from her first semester in the Netherlands that Murphy found she needed a succinct, impactful way to communicate what the trip had meant to her.

Marie Bongiovanni, chair and professor of English, suggested that Murphy explore an emerging form of videography known as multimedia narrative. "It's really about deep reflection," Murphy explains, describing the intensely focused and tightly edited form of filmmaking. "You write a short script, usually just 250 words, and spend a lot of time editing and thinking deeply about your topic and what images you want to use."

"During my internship, I will help evaluate videos for foreign service officers and make suggestions for ways to make them more relevant and user-friendly."

Working with Bongiovanni, Murphy crafted an arresting three-minute digital film that encapsulates the fundamental experience of her travel abroad. Visit www.lvc.edu/youtube/murphy to see the video.

She also later worked with Bongiovanni on an Arnold Grant-supported student-faculty research project that explored the potential of multimedia narrative to help other returning study-abroad students integrate and communicate their experiences. Murphy presented her findings at NAFSA: Association of International Educators, in Houston.

Currently pursuing a master's degree in international communication at American University in Washington, D.C., Murphy has been helping the school to incorporate videos into its communications with international students, who may struggle with text-heavy materials. "In this position I don't actually make the videos, but because of my knowledge I can share my expectations, make a storyboard, help edit the films, and give my feedback," she says.

Murphy is also interning with the U.S. Department of State's Foreign Service Institute, where she is involved with research and training. She expects to use her multimedia narrative skills during this experience. "During my internship, I will help evaluate videos for foreign service officers and make suggestions for ways to make them more relevant and user-friendly," she says.

Murphy has found that multimedia narrative has many applications beyond helping her share her experiences with friends and family. "It's relevant in just about every facet of my life here," she says. "It's the first thing people see on my résumé, and employers always ask about it. This is something I use to enhance whatever I do."

Leading Future Teachers Into Technological Competency

That college students should master the ins and outs of personal technology is a given these days, but the skill has perhaps the most far-reaching impact when the students are future educators—those who will be responsible for introducing their own students to all the capabilities at their fingertips.

Dr. Andrew Darian, assistant professor of education, teaches Educational Technology and Instructional Media to education majors with an eye toward fostering a deep technological competency among his students that they in turn can pass on to future generations.

"We're educating teachers to be teachers of young children, who can make clear academic and social choices when using technology," Darian says. "I teach technology because the students are being asked to choose, use, and monitor it as a day-to-day tool in the classroom."

Darian teaches his students to be fluent in both Microsoft and Apple operating systems, as well as each system's most relevant applications. "They need to know what they can do in software programs such as Microsoft Word," he says. "They need to know what PowerPoint is capable of, how to insert movies and clips into their presentations, and why it is essential for Smart Board presentations. Excel is very useful because teachers can keep track of their students' work and assessments. They can also set up a blog or an online newsletter to better communicate with the parents of their students."

Darian's goal is to move his students past the superficial proficiency that they pick up on their own by writing college papers and surfing the Internet. He wants them to develop an informed technological expertise in a broad range of hardware and software. "Students need to understand and know their technology because, from Kindergarten on, teachers are required to teach technology to their students," he says. "They come in knowing how to use their phone or computer to do social media. But in the classroom, they will need to make informed choices about time spent on technology, age-appropriate programming, and its academic value. My job is to make sure they not only understand their technology on a deeper level, but also its social and academic implications."

Success Yielding Success

Impressed by LVC Alumni Hires, a Local Web-Based Company Begins Recruiting on Campus

A track record of excellence, combined with a tight alumni network, has led to a cluster of LVC grads pursuing technology careers with Lancaster County-based Clark Associates, a family of companies that repeatedly has been named to the Central Penn Business Journal's list of Top 50 Fastest Growing Companies. In fact, they were #1 this year.

Many of the 15 Dutchmen currently working at Clark are heavily involved with Web development and content, while others are working in the financial sector. They all credit LVC for preparing them for their careers.

Brian Montgomery '07 has been with Clark the longest. An English major with a music minor, today Montgomery is a content writer for Clark's web-based food-service equipment supplier,

The WEBstaurant Store. His work requires him to write for many different audiences, from external customers to colleagues to high-level company executives, and he credits his academic and internship experiences at the Valley for helping him to develop the versatility he needs every day. "I had classes ranging from basic literature to public relations and copy editing," he says, adding that he also worked on the student-run newspaper, La Vie Collegienne, and participated in three different internships. "My participation in a diverse range of activities and programs gave me great experience working with and for different audiences," he says.

Montgomery believes that the College's liberal arts focus also helped prepare him for his web-oriented career. "My professors challenged me to come to my own conclusions and solve problems

3D Printing: LVC Participates in the World's First Collaborative 3D Sculpture

Over the past year, the Digital Communications Program and the Office of Information Technology have been working with 3D printing and have brought this new technology directly into the hands of LVC students. Furthermore, LVC participated in a groundbreaking art sculpture in which makers and hobbyists around the globe created interlocking designs for the world's first collaborative 3D sculpture.

The sculpture, "Linked," was unveiled in Calgary, Alberta, on Sept. 14, and included two LVC-specific designs. Naturally, they were the LVC logo and the Dutchman. Taking advantage of the new technology and the ability to quickly design, prototype, and create products, the Office of Information Technology also has created and printed mounting brackets and accessories for the new Lynch Technology Center.

for myself," he says. "At The WEBstaurant Store, that kind of thinking is highly encouraged. I believe that's another reason why LVC grads are successful here, because that mindset fits really well with what we're looking for in new hires."

LVC's close-knit social fabric is another factor leading so many Valley alumni to Clark Associates, Montgomery says. "We're increasing our staffing, and since we're all doing well here and we work very well together, we've been encouraged to reach out to LVC and step up our recruiting on campus."

That networking played a key role in helping Emily Gertenbach '11 start her career at The WEBstaurant Store. She is currently a content writer and product applications specialist at the company. "I was in a job search and came across an advertisement for the position I have now," Gertenbach says. "I recognized the name of the company and knew Jake [King '11] had a job there. I called him and he helped get my résumé to the manager."

Like Montgomery, Gertenbach has found that her Valley education was an ideal foundation for her career. "LVC prepared us well for technology careers because its liberal arts model is so interdisciplinary," she says. "The school also has a very good technology program, and the Lynch Technology Center is filled with computers that include the relevant software students will need to be familiar with when they graduate."

"I use my writing and technology education from LVC every day," Gertenbach adds. "All of my English classes prepared me for a career in a writing field, but particularly my journalism classes. My grammar class with Dr. [Gary] Grieve-Carlson [professor of English] was extremely helpful. I also took classes in multimedia narrative, graphic design, and web enterprise, and worked in the Office of Information Technology, and all of that has been beneficial."

Gertenbach notes that the success of LVC alumni at Clark is leading to a more formal connection between the company and the school. "We're actually now actively recruiting at the school," she says. "We go onto campus and talk to classes and set up information tables. Just the other day I had an LVC student shadowing me, and we visited a class this fall, so we're intentionally spreading the word."

Not Your Parents' Computer Lab

In the early days of computing, a college computer lab could be a stuffy, demoralizing place, filled with long tables where students would sit in rows facing computers with little flexibility or opportunity for working together.

This summer, LVC's Lynch Technology Center (LTC) broke that mold with a major renovation—driven by data—about how Valley students actually use computers and technology.

LVC's primary student computing and technology resource, the LTC features more than 30 Windows and Apple computers, a scanning station, high-speed color and black-and-white laser printers, two multi-user touch-screen stations, and four group collaboration spaces.

The collaboration spaces, perhaps the most innovative aspect of the redesigned center, enable up to five students to link their tablets and laptops to one large video monitor and work from each computer collaboratively. "It works well for anything from writing a paper together to creating a presentation based on a research project," explains David Shapiro '99, LVC's director of information technology.

That flexibility is central to the entire redesign of the LTC, and the center is structured so that students can use it in whatever way is most helpful. "We wanted to give students the ability to use the center in a variety of ways, whether it's working on a touch-screen computer, in one of the collaborative spaces, or using your own technology stretched out on a couch," Shapiro says, adding that the center's renovations were built around data on student usage gathered over previous years. "We looked at how many students enter the room, what computers they typically go to, and what software they used, and we built the space around that data," he explains, noting that students seem to especially appreciate the couches, chairs, and ottomans available for individual or group work. "We really wanted to have this room breathing and livable, not a stuffy place where everyone sits in a row and writes a paper."

The LTC is already quite popular on campus, with up to 600 individual logins each day—a figure Shapiro says probably underestimates the center's actual usage, since it doesn't take into account collaborative groups or those who work from their own laptops.

Shapiro adds that the LTC is just one of many ways in which the College is continuing to offer the latest in technology to students. "We are continually monitoring the technology needs of our students and looking toward where technology and industry trends are moving," he says.

From adding new technology-oriented concentrations to the digital communications major, such as the user-design concentration, to helping faculty incorporate technology into their daily curriculum, LVC strives to stay ahead of the technology curve so that students have a distinct advantage when they enter the global economy.

LVC's Tradition of Excellence

Opens Internship and Subsequent Employment Opportunities

In 1999, computer science major Mary Barrell Kunkle '00 was looking for an internship for the summer before her senior year. Robert Dillane '77, director of enterprise information systems at LVC, suggested that she apply at Datatel, a company based in Fairfax, Va., which specialized in creating and implementing administrative software for colleges and universities—including LVC.

"The internship allowed us to work onsite for the summer. They put us up in apartments and paid us and had us work on various projects," Kunkle explains. "Then after the summer was over, part of the internship was to spend time working on campus with the product. So I spent the next year working in the IT Department at LVC."

Datatel evidently was pleased with Kunkle's work—the company made her a job offer in March of her senior year. She started her career at Datatel right after graduation, and today is a senior consultant with the company—now known as Ellucian—working with new clients to migrate data into their new software systems.

Kunkle remembers that the internship was a great experience—and that several of her fellow majors were interested in it the following year. Eric Connelly '01, Parrish Fessler '01, and Jason Hocker '01 applied and were awarded internships at Datatel in the summer of 2000. Today, Fessler (associate project manager) and Hocker (principal software developer) are still with the company, while Connelly is an application developer at JPMorgan Chase. Over the years, several other LVC students have interned with the company, including Sarah White '02 and Chris Ulicny '12.

Kunkle believes LVC prepared her well for her work at Ellucian. "More than anything else, I think the work ethic required by the professors made a difference," she says. "And learning how any computer language structure is made helps—that gave me a good base for quickly learning any language that I needed to learn."

Hocker agrees: "Dr. [Ken] Yarnall [chair and associate professor of mathematical sciences] always told us that he was preparing us to be able to learn new things. It was my ability to quickly understand new technology that made me a good candidate. You have to be able to keep learning and working on new technology." Like Kunkle, Hocker was offered full-time employment at Datatel during the spring of his senior year, and he began his career there after graduation.

Today, Hocker works at Ellucian as the iOS and Android developer of the company's mobile phone application Ellucian GO. He remembers that Dillane interviewed potential internship candidates from LVC, essentially nominating students for the internship, and that Dillane's recommendation went a long way toward winning a candidate an internship. "At Ellucian, we have a really good relationship with our clients, such as LVC," he says. "If you say Bob Dillane's name around here, people know who he is."

"One thing I love about Ellucian is working with colleges," Hocker continues. "I feel good about what we're working on, and I love our relationship with LVC and other colleges." Hocker notes that the insights he gained as a student intern still inform his work today. "When I'm working on a new product, I'm thinking about how it will affect the school and how it will help them better their systems," he says. "It's helpful to keep in mind what kind of impact this new technology will have on the school."

Helping Companies Make the Best of Their Workforce

LVC trustee Ryan Tweedie '93 was an exceptionally well-rounded student at the Valley, majoring in management, playing on the College's golf and soccer teams, and pledging Tau Kappa Epsilon. Perhaps it was this wide-ranging college experience that prepared Tweedie for the work he's done over the last two decades helping more than 200 organizations—many of them Global 1000 companies—to enhance their workforce through software that optimizes their human capital management and human resources management systems.

"After graduation I was fortunate, in a very difficult market, to find a job working for Thomson Financial in New York City," Tweedie says. "I learned, in depth, all about the Internet and network computing, and I was able to work directly with very big clients."

Tweedie then moved on to a position as director of information technology for a small software company near his home in New Jersey. "Ultimately, I ended up running and selling that company," he says. "After that, I'd caught the entrepreneurial 'bug,' and I began a company called HRSoft."

At HRSoft, Tweedie specialized in developing and implementing human capital management software for large organizations such as DuPont, Chase, Novartis, Johnson & Johnson, and Pepsi. After eight years, Tweedie sold the company and founded Sapien Software LLC, which today is a leading provider of global human capital management software, with clients such as Constellation Energy, GE Plastics, and MetLife. At Sapien, Tweedie set the company's vision and international strategy, as well as oversaw sales, marketing, and business development.

Tweedie sold Sapien last summer and today serves as a partner at Ernst & Young for Human Resource Technology. "Fortunately, I actually enjoy what I do and find it intellectually stimulating," he says. "Every day, I can affect real positive change in global companies. That they trust me, rely on me, and give me appropriate recognition is very rewarding."

Tweedie believes strongly in the value of an LVC education for those interested in the technology field, in large part because of the well-rounded education it provides. "LVC offers excellent academics, but equally important is that it offers a very diverse college experience," he says. "I made friends and connections for life there, was in a fraternity as well as other social clubs, played formal and intramural sports, was involved in community activities, and more. That experience was very valuable to me, and I believe it's a major differentiator for LVC."

Tweedie joined LVC's Board of Trustees in 2010 and is gratified to have been called to serve his alma mater. "The experience has been terrific, and challenging, but more than anything, rewarding," he says. "I have a massive passion for LVC and believe in it as a great experience for our students. That I can play a real role in helping shape sustainability for LVC for decades gives me immense personal satisfaction."

Still Thinking on His Feet

When LVC trustee Terence "Terry" Brown '78 graduated from Lebanon Valley, the technology sector of the U.S. economy was largely unknown. And truth be told, it wasn't his first career choice. A heavily recruited high school football standout from the Washington, D.C., area with a professional career in his sights, Brown found himself in the spring of his senior year suddenly without college scholarship prospects when a patellar tendon injury sidelined him during his final high school track meet—the state championships. "But my assistant track coach was good friends with [the late vice president of admissions emeritus] Gregory Stanson '63, and that got the ball rolling at Lebanon Valley," Brown says. "And from the day this city boy took a step onto the campus, it was a done deal."

At the Valley, Brown continued to excel in football and track & field—he was inducted into the LVC Athletic Hall of Fame in 1996—while pledging Phi Lambda Sigma and studying political science.

"At Lebanon Valley, my professors and classmates pressed each other—we challenged each other," Brown says. "That liberal arts approach taught us how to think on our feet, how to become critical thinkers, how to solve problems. It prepared us for a wide variety of fields."

After graduation, Brown still had his heart set on the gridiron. "I had a brief stint trying out for the Dallas Cowboys and the Philadelphia Eagles, but I didn't make either roster," he says. Ultimately, he took a position in sales at Xerox Corporation and discovered that he was well suited to the work and enjoyed it. "I found that I was very well prepared and motivated—I was also smart enough to follow the trends," he says. "I started in copier duplicators, then moved on to computer hardware and ultimately to software sales." After Xerox, Brown progressed through leadership and management positions with Eastman Kodak Company, Unisys Corporation, and Oracle Corporation.

In 2007, Brown co-founded Brown Technology Group LLC, which specializes in enterprise resource planning applications implementation, database management and optimization, data migration, learning systems, and information security. As company president, Brown shares executive responsibilities with his brother and co-founder James "J.B." Brown and Chief Executive Officer Reggie Brown, who is no relation. The group serves customers in federal, state, and local government, as well as the health care and commercial sectors, and recently moved its offices to Rockville, Md., from Chantilly, Va.

Three decades into his career, Brown is still excited to be in the technology field. "I love what I'm doing right now. It's a wide open field, constantly changing," he says. "And the young folks that we hire continually keep me on my toes. I love that I get to go out and hire the brightest and the best, and I will say I'm partial to liberal arts graduates. I know they can think on their feet."

Brown joined the LVC Board of Trustees in 2011 and is chair of the board's Marketing and Enrollment Committee. He values his ongoing relationship with the Valley. "I enjoy giving back," he says. "I know I wouldn't be where I am today if it wasn't for Lebanon Valley College, so it's a pleasure to be able to give back with my time and financial resources."

Putting Valley History Online

Vernon and Doris Bishop Library Online Archives

Since she returned to the Valley in 2010 as LVC's access services librarian, Maureen Anderson Bentz '00 has focused on making the College's historical documents available online. She has overseen the digitization of thousands of archival materials—most recently, 100 years of LVC publications, including the student newspaper—making them searchable for anyone with online access.

By all accounts, the Valley community is thrilled to have access to these documents. The College's online digital archives—which include decades of yearbooks, course catalogs, and issues of The Valley magazine—attracted more than 16,500 page views during the 2012–2013 academic year alone, and Bentz expects usage

The College's online digital archives—which include decades of yearbooks, course catalogs, and issues of The Valley magazine—attracted more than 16,500 page views...

Students working in the library have been a great help in the project, Bentz says, especially Ally Stengel '13, Betty Ross '14, and Leann Hyatt '13, D'15. "These students have contributed at a very high level to the digitization preparation and behind-the-scenes work," she says, noting that the project was funded in part by a grant from the Alfred P. Sloan Foundation.

LVC's online archives project extends beyond paper documents. Frank Mols, director of the Vernon and Doris Bishop Library, is currently working with Rick Beard '90, M'92, LVC's director of athletics, to digitize the College's athletic films. In addition, Bentz will soon work with the Office of Marketing and Communications to digitize the Valley's photograph collection.

Bishop Library's online holdings extend far beyond the College archives. Mols notes that the library recently increased its collection by 130,000 books—all of them e-books accessible remotely through its online catalog. The library also provides access to more than 500 electronic reference books through the CREDO Reference Database, and more than 48,000 electronic journals through various databases and e-journal packages. "Part of our mission is to make our students lifelong learners," Mols says. "If they learn these searching tools and master these databases, the world of knowledge is at their fingertips."

to continue to grow as the newspaper collection becomes fully available online in the spring of 2014.

"Our physical archives are accessible only by appointment, and we have limited staff, so it's really important that folks have access to these documents online," Bentz says. "It's also helpful to make the information accessible not only for myself, but for other librarians and people on campus."

Using Technology to Enhance Learning

As director of LVC's Center for Excellence in Teaching and Learning (CETL) and Educational Technology, Megan Potteiger spends much of her time investigating the most innovative classroom technologies available. She then shows College faculty how to use these technologies to enhance the ways they share ideas with students and to perform stronger assessment and outcome measurements.

"Our students are coming in already having been exposed to a wide variety of technology. Our challenge is to find the best ways to reach students and have them learn, not just information on the surface, but deeply," Potteiger says. "We look for ways to use technology to create learning experiences for students that go above and beyond what you traditionally think of—not just in presenting information, but even mapping out concepts better or interacting with people that they've never had a chance to interact with."

Potteiger, who graduated Phi Beta Kappa with a bachelor's degree in chemistry from The College of William and Mary, spans the faculty-administrator nexus by virtue of her experiences at the University of Pennsylvania, where she earned a master's degree in organic chemistry. At Penn, she was the Center for Teaching and Learning Senior Graduate Fellow for Teaching Excellence and won the Penn Prize for Excellence in Teaching. Potteiger is also teaching a chemistry course at LVC. She has quickly adapted many of these skills to her role with CETL.

CETL programming, which includes monthly workshops, informal discussion groups, and longer-term learning communities, doesn't focus exclusively on technology in education. Still, Potteiger says, most discussions about enhancing the classroom experience tend to include technological innovation. For this reason, she has become a kind of ambassador between LVC's Office of Information Technology and the faculty. "Part of what I do is help to inform IT about what the faculty needs are, and then inform the faculty about what our IT capabilities are," she says. "It works out really well that we can have this conversation about what the faculty want, and IT can investigate the technological aspects, and I can interpret that for the faculty. There really is a lot available out there on the tech side, and we want to make sure that we can provide the best support for the faculty—and therefore to the students."

Using Technology to Explore Their Curiosity

For Ryan Humphries '12, computer technology offers more than a tool for making life more efficient. As the elementary and middle school gifted support teacher for the Solanco School District in Lancaster County, Humphries is passionate about using computers to open doors for his students to explore the contours of their curiosity. "When it comes to teaching gifted students, there are a lot of opportunities that technology can provide that it couldn't even 10 years ago," he says. "A lot of what we do is project-based and very individualized to meet each student's learning strengths, so there are a lot of opportunities for exploration with my students. They can really dig into things that interest them, direct their own learning, and make connections across content areas, which is really big."

But for Humphries, who studied elementary and special education at LVC, technology is about far more than surfing the Internet. "We use technology for a lot of Internet research, but also as a tool for manipulating thoughts and ideas," he says. "It allows for a lot of creativity in how they present projects. PowerPoint is an option, but it's not the only option anymore. They can record videos, make more creative presentations, even make podcasts."

"We use technology for a lot of Internet research, but also as a tool for manipulating thoughts and ideas," Humphries says. "It allows for a lot of creativity in how they present projects."

The kids might have a subject and create a transcript explaining that subject and then record it through something like GarageBand, where they can add music and some pizzazz to what they're doing."

Humphries looks forward to future innovations in the way students can use technology to explore their interests. "It's so essential that they're technologically literate," he says. "It's tough to predict where technology will go in the future because everything is changing so fast, but we can see inklings in the way media is changing." He anticipates innovations in the video gaming field that would enable his students to use games to explore an idea or tell a story. But no matter which direction new technologies take, Humphries is committed to helping his students stay abreast of the changes as they explore the ideas that excite them the most.

Anticipating the Pace of Change

Once they've taught a class several times, some professors can reuse lecture notes and materials, because course content doesn't change dramatically from year to year. Such is decidedly not the case for Mathew Samuel, assistant professor of digital communications, who finds that he constantly revamps his courses to encompass technological innovations in the marketplace.

Still, Samuel doesn't allow his students' need to master advances in technology to obscure their parallel need to master foundational principles of design. "In my Fundamentals of Design class, the first task in any project is to begin concepts by hand," Samuel says. "I want students to understand the basic design principles by hand so that they get a grasp of the key elements they need to develop for a project. Then, the second half of the project uses software, such as Adobe Photoshop, as a way to execute those principles into solutions. So there's a direct correlation between what they've learned by hand and what they then use technology to execute—so that they use technology as a tool rather than a crutch."

Samuel says his graduates tend to go into design-based careers where they are called on to craft presentation components or digital animation using both the technology and the design principles they learned in the classroom, developing everything from basic storyboards to videos created using programs such as Adobe AfterEffects.

"One of our new concentrations focuses on user experience," Samuel says, noting that advertising agencies have begun to rebrand themselves as "user experience agencies." "A lot of our focus is shifting toward the user's experience and how the user interacts with product features or the company website or its mobile app," he says, adding that he's teaching several new courses in upcoming semesters that explore such topics as prototyping and packaging.

The speed of change in digital technology presents an ongoing challenge to Samuel. "Even the most basic aspects of the Web change every six months," he says. "We just revamped our Web markup and layout course to fit with HTML5 and CSS3 to get the students more involved and experienced with current standards in the industry, because they're expected to know it when they graduate."

Online Course Options

for Graduate Students

The Office of Graduate Studies & Continuing Education Steps Into Online Programming This Spring

When Dr. Gregory Buckley signed on as LVC's associate dean of graduate studies & continuing education last summer, one of his first projects was moving the College toward offering online classes. "Adults have very different needs than traditional-age students, and one of those is convenience," he says. "With work and family, older students often need the flexibility of online coursework."

The College will offer its first fully online classes this spring, one in each of its master's programs: business administration, music education, and science education. But that will be just the beginning. "Within the next several years, we expect to make the entire MBA degree available in an online format," Buckley says. "Online programming will never replace face-to-face coursework, but it will be there for those who choose or need online education."

The College's timing couldn't be better, Buckley says. "One of the advantages of getting into online education at this stage is that we really do have a sense of what best practice is. Educators have done research into the most effective online teaching strategies, and there's a solid pedagogy emerging that we intend to take full advantage of."

New technologies also are available that enable online students to replicate the experience—and the rigor—of a face-to-face class. "Online education has come a long way since it first started," Buckley adds. "There is so much technology that enables group interaction, where you're actually seeing each other and working together in real time instead of just emailing back and forth."

The bottom line, Buckley says, is that LVC's online courses will deliver a uniquely LVC experience. "Our online coursework shares the College's overall educational mission, and a lot of that is related to the interactive experience students encounter," Buckley says. "We're designing our courses to incorporate, as much as we can, that type of experience using a different delivery model."

Lebanon Valley College

How can I make a significant impact on LVC,
and avoid paying any income tax on the amount of my gift?

A Charitable IRA Rollover enables you to transfer directly a gift from your Individual Retirement Account (IRA) to Lebanon Valley College.

When you ask your IRA custodian to send a distribution directly to LVC, you may exclude the amount from your taxable income, making your gift tax-free. The amount you transfer also can fulfill all or part of your yearly required minimum distribution (RMD).

The Thomas Rhys Vickroy Society

Lebanon Valley College has been shaping the lives of students for more than 147 years with help from those who believe, like our founding president Thomas Rhys Vickroy did, in its mission of service through knowledge.

Alumni and friends who are members of the Vickroy Society demonstrate outstanding leadership in supporting the College. During the past academic year, Vickroy Society members provided more than $1.45 million in financial resources for College programs, totaling 47 percent of all contributions to the Valley.

EDUCATING FOR IMPACT INVESTING IN THE FUTURE

Your support of LVC's PRESIDENT'S INNOVATION FUND provides additional resources for interdisciplinary, collaborative, and entrepreneurial approaches to College teaching.

Your gift to THE VALLEY FUND supports services and opportunities that students depend on each day—generous scholarships, inspiring faculty, and enriching educational resources and student programming.

Your investment in LVC's HIGH-IMPACT EXPERIENCE FUND underwrites activities, both inside and outside the classroom, that deepen student learning and engagement. These transformative experiences include study abroad, undergraduate research, service learning, and professional internships, among others.
